K k Roman, K k Italic, both which are uſed in the Engliſh and ſeveral European languages; 𝔎 𝔨 black letter Engliſh and German, pronounced alóne ká, but ought by analogy to be called ké, as bé, cé, dé, and the reſt of the mute ſiſters; Κ κ Κάππα Greek, from the Chaldee כף כפא Kaph, ſignifying the hollow of the hand, which כ in its figure reſembles, the lower part whereof being elongated makes the final ך, and from this inverted is formed the Greek Κ, and by imminution, and bowing the right ſide, the ſmall κ. The power of which letter is invaded by qu and c; as, κερκὶς, querqueda, dim. querquedula; κοινὸν, cœnum: and in like manner the Latin C is expreſſed by the Greek Κ; as, Claudius Cæſar, Κλαύδιος Καῖσαρ. And indeed the Latin C not only anſwers in ſound to K, but alſo takes its figure from the ſame Hebrew letter: For as the figure of K is formed from the final ך, as is before ſhewed, ſo C is nothing but כ turned to the right, in compliance with the Weſtern way of writing. Notwithſtanding it appears that antiently K held its own place in many (eſpecially Greek) words, and derivatives from thence, as κάλαβρα, kalabra, κοινισμὸς, kœniſmus, καρχηδὼν, Karthago, καλάνδαι, kalendæ; though theſe alſo are equally writ by c, vid. Quint. Inſtit. 1, 7. K has alſo been continued in ſome words of Hebrew extraction; as, Kariſſimus, in antient monuments, from יקר; Kalumnia, from כלמה; K k. antiently marked on the foreheads of thoſe convicted of calumny. In our Engliſh tongue indeed, though diſuſed in Latin, it is not only a frequent letter, but uſed even after c, to harden its ſound; as from λείχω, 𝔩𝔦𝔠𝔨, κοκκὸς, (Heſych. gallus) a 𝔠𝔥𝔦𝔠𝔨; which in words of Latin and Greek derivation may well be ſpared; as public, critic, hectic; not publick, &c.

L.

L l Roman, L l Italic, 𝔏 𝔩 old Engliſh and German, which pronounced alone we call el, prefixing e, as we alſo pronounce the other ſiſter liquids el, em, en, er corruptly ar; to diſtinguiſh them from the family of the mutes, whoſe ſound we make articulate by poſtponing e, as bé, cé, dé, &c. Hebrew ל Lamedh, amongſt other ſignifications denoting a goad, or ſpit, which the figure reſembles; Chaldee למדא Lamda, from whence the Greek Lambda, by inſerting b; as alſo by removing m, labda. The Latin L is formed from the Greek Λ, by ſtraightning one of the acute legs, and turning the other into the baſis. It hath the firſt place in the order of the liquids, and is, as Plato in Cratyl. has obſerved, the ſweeteſt of them, and is ſuited to ſoft and eaſy deſcriptions; as, Molle meum levibus cor eſt violabile telis. It was uſually ſounded by the old Britons with a kind of aſpiration, and was writ in many words with ll, as afterwards with lh, as in llân, or lhân, a temple; llâu, or lhâu, an hand; which ſound is made, by hiſſing l obliquely through the teeth, and aſpirating it, which indeed is beſt taken in by the ear. Thus the oldeſt Greeks ſounded its ſiſter P when initial, PH; as PHOME, Roma; which in later times, after H was exterminated, being ſupplied by a note of aſpiration prefixed, though pronounced after it, was writ as now, ʽΡώμη; and this aſpiration is ſtill kept in ſome Latin words of Greek extraction, as in Rhamnus, Rhetor, &c. This liquid is ſubjoined to the mutes b, f, g, p, in the beginning of ſyllables in Latin words, as in blatta, eblandior; flo, confligo; gloria, conglobo; plango, compleo: alſo to t and th, in derivatives from the Greek, as Atlas, athleta; but never before q and v. All the liquids by grammarians are called immutables; as indeed they are with reſpect to the mutes, but not in regard to themſelves, as we learn from Νύμφη, lympha, ager, agellus; λείριον, lilium, παῦρος, paulus. The change indeed of the final letter in the prepoſitions con, in, per, and inter, into the liquid, when compounding ſome ſimple word beginning therewith, ſeems arbitrary; and we may write either conligo, or colligo; inlido, or illido; perluo, or pelluo; interlego, or intellego, &c. ſince the former way of writing was of antient uſe; as in all the other letters, ſo even in theſe particularly; and the latter only introduced to ſoften the ſound: as we ſee alſo in prepoſitions ending with mutes, prefixt to words beginning with mutes or liquids, for the ſame reaſon ſuffer the ſame, or greater variations; as, abſfero, aufero; adnuo, annuo; adfero, affero; obfero, offero; tranſno, trano, &c. In ſome few words indeed the liquid l may ſeem ſubſtituted for d; as lacryma for δάκρυμα, alacris for ἄδακρυς; but both theſe derivations may juſtly be ſuſpected, unleſs confirmed by more unexceptionable inſtances. In numeral notes, L is put for fifty, the half of C, or, as antiently made by the Saxons, ⊏, making the curve angular, analogically to V, five, as being half an X, ten. In the compendious notes of the antients, L. ſtands for Lælius, Lælia, Lucius, Luceius, Lex, Lector, Libertus, Libra; L. A. Lex alia; LA. C. Latini coloni; L. A. D. Locus alteri datus; L. AG. M m Latin, Μ μ Greek, called Μῦ, either from its ſound, the Greek Μυκάω and the Latin mugio being formed from hence, or rather from μύω, claudo, becauſe it opens and ſhuts the lips; מ Hebrew in the beginning and middle of words; ם, or, if the vacant ſpace in the end of a line require it, ﬦ: it is perhaps called מם mem from its double form, open and ſhut, which in writing its name is repreſented; or it may be from מום a blot, which the Arabians uſe for its figure: 𝔐 𝔪 Engliſh and German black letter. Its ſound is inarticulate, formed by the mouth through the lips. This letter, though a liquid, ſuffers no mute in Latin to ſtand before it in the ſame ſyllable, except g, and that only in one pure claſſical word, viz. agmen; although among the Greeks, who perhaps gave it a ſofter ſound, it follows δ, σ, and τ, as δμώη, ἄσθμα, τμῆσις; but in different ſyllables it doth not refuſe to uſher its ſiſter labials b and p, as ambulo, amplus; alſo itſelf and n, as mamma, damnum, but no other: For in order to avoid the company of the reſt, it prevails with its neighbour n to be its ſubſtitute, as in anceps, anfractus, anhelo, anquiro, anſanctus (but this is alſo writ amſanctus) which are all compounded of the inſeparable prepoſition am: but the prepoſition circum for the moſt part keeps its m before all letters, though in ſome few words n is uſed ſometimes indifferently for it, as circundo, or circumdo; and ſometimes loſeth it, as in circueo, circuitio, which however it may equally retain. Before its ſiſter ſemivowels l and r, its cognates, ſoften the ſound. But m is not behindhand in office with its neighbour n, willingly taking its place before the labials b, p, and m, as in imbellis, impius, immodeſtus; combibo, compleo, commendo: alſo in the Greek tongue, as ἐμβάλλω, ἐμμένω, ἐμπίπλω, and alſo antiently in diverſe words, as in the Sigean Pſephiſm in honour of Antiochus, τὴμ βασιλέιαν, τῶμ πραγμάτων, τὴμ μὲν ἱέρειαν: Alſo before t, d, and q, as in tantum from tam tum, quendam for quemdam, quenquam for quemquam. M alſo in Latin words is put for the Greek ν, as in muſam for μῦσαν, organum for ὄργανον, &c. But in Latin accuſatives of the third declenſion, which anſwers to the fifth of the Greeks, m is often a formative only, as in patrem, matrem, from πατέρα, μητέρα, It is alſo ſervile in forming tenſes of Latin verbs, as notabam, notarem, from notare: This ſervility perhaps might be the reaſon why the antients very obſcurely pronounced this letter, eſpecially before a vowel, as optimu'ſt, factu'ſt. Cato writ die' hanc for diem hanc; and probably when not cut off by the poets, who then uſe it ſhort, as Cujus non hederæ circumiere caput, Propert. not fully pronounced. M in numerals is one thouſand, from the firſt letter of mille according to Priſcian, but with more probability from this antient mark CIϽ, which by the negligence or ignorance of tranſcribers was drawn together and made ⅭⅠↃ, the half of which, D, from hence ſtands for five hundred. In the compendious notes of the antients, M. is uſed for Manlius, Marcus, Martius, or Mucius; M' Manius; M. B. Mulier bona; MAG. EQ. Magiſter equitum; MAG. MIL. Magiſter militum; MAT. P. FEC. & S. P. Q. Mater pia fecit & ſuis poſteriſque; M. M. P. Manu, mancipio, poteſtate.

N n Roman, N n Italic, both which are, as all the other letters, frequently uſed in moſt of the modern languages of Europe; eſpecially ſuch as deſcend from the Latin. The Engliſh indeed, beſides theſe, have a black character ſomewhat like the German, in which this letter is thus expreſt, 𝔑 n; but of no great antiquity, and ſeldom uſed but in printing ſtatutes and proclamations; for our Saxon anceſtors uſed a letter very little differing from the Roman. The Hebrew tongue hath a double form of this letter, the one initial and medial נ, the other final ן, which might be the cauſe of calling it נון, which is expreſſive of both forms; in analogy to מם, which probably was ſo called from the ſame cauſe. Indeed there is a great ſhew of reaſon why it ſhould be called נון from the ſignification of the word, which is a child, as being the undoubted daughter of her mother מ. The Greeks, in taking theſe two letters from them, ſeem to have had regard to both theſe reaſons, diſcarding the finals in both, as having no occaſion for them in their tongue; and yet, to ſhew their near relation, gave them an analogical articulation, calling as the former Μῦ, ſo the latter Νῦ. Nor are theſe two liquids nearer in name, than they are in their figure, ſound, and mutual offices in Greek and Latin. With reſpect to their figure, they differ juſt ſo much and no more, in both the capital and ſmall form, as they do in their ſound; M m being a fuller ſound, having one line more than N n the ſmaller ſound, without any other difference. Their nearneſs in ſound is more remarkable becauſe made by diſtinct organs, the former being a labial, the latter a dental; which is cauſed by their equally touching the palate. Nor is their reciprocal uſe in languages leſs obvious: The plural termination ים in Hebrew, in the Chaldee dialect is ין; as on the contrary, the terminations ον and ων in Greek, are um in Latin; as ᾠὸν ovum; κοινὸν cœnum, βραχίων brachium: αν and ην, the terminations of the accuſ. ſing. of the ſecond declenſion of the Greeks, am in the firſt declenſion of the Latins; as μῦσαν, σχολὴν, muſam, ſcholam. In Latin derivatives from the Greek, as ν is ſometimes changed into m, as in νέω, meo; ſo on the contrary μ into n, as in μειδέω, nideo: and as before the firſt rank of the mutes, and their ſiſter labial m, n is changed into m for the better ſound, as in imbellis, impius, immodicus; ſo on the contrary, in the ſecond and third order, m is converted into n before c, q, d, t; as in anceps, nunquis, quendam, tantum: which alſo is done before f and h, as in anfractus, anhelus. The change of this letter into her other ſiſter liquids l and r, before another l and r, as in illudo, irrideo, is common, as being only made for the better ſound in pure Latin words; but the ſame is alſo done in Latin derivatives from the Greek tongue, as in ne from μὴ, lympha from νύμφη (whence our Maſter Priſcian accounts for the uſe of the Latin numeral L, inſtead of Ν the Greek numeral for 50, The moſt antient Greeks, ſaith he, uſed L for N, which we ſtill herein retain) in mora, from μονὴ, in criſſo, from κνίζω. As γ, before κ, γ, χ, is in Greek ſounded like n, ſo in Latin words derived from ſuch, n is ſubſtituted for γ; as ancora, angelus, angelus, Anchiſes, for ἄγκυρα, ἄγγελος, Ἀγχίσης, though the more antient Latins, Accius in particular, as Varro acquaints us, retained g, writing aggulus, aggens, agguilla, iggerunt; and this not only in derivatives from Greek, but perhaps in ſome of their own words. In many Latin words from Greek families, n is inſerted, eſpecially before mutes of the ſecond and third order, as in mingo, lingo, jungo, ſcando, frango, from μιγῶ, λιχῶ, ζυγῶ, σκαδῶ, φραγῶ, the ſecond fut. tenſe of μιγέω, λαχέω, ζεύγω, σκάζω, ῥήσσω, which epenthetical cuſtom is worthy to be noted, as by means whereof from verbs barytones the Latins naturalized many Greek words. But this inſerted n diſappears often in their derivatives, as in micturio, ligurio, jugum, conjux, fragor, fragilis; as alſo before gn, as ignarus, ignavus, cognoſco, and others. Beſides the letters already mentioned, n admits after it itſelf, ſ and x (a compound of ſ, and the ſecond order of the mutes) as annus, anſa, anxius; and in compoſition j and v, as conjicio, convoco. In writing ſome Latin proper names, where ns concur either in the middle or end of words, the Greeks, to ſoften the ſound, leave out n, as Ὁρτήσιος, Κλήμης, Πούδης, for Hortenſius, Clemens, Pudens. This letter is often omitted by the Latins, when they enfranchiſe Greek words ending in ων; as Leo, Draco, for Λέων, Δράκων: contrariwiſe, to Latin words ending in o, the Greeks add n, writing Κάτων, Νέρων, for Cato, Nero. In ſome inſcriptions of the middle age, and tranſcripts of that time from elder originals, we find this letter in long ſyllables of many words inſerted; as Atlans, gigans, elephans: which perhaps may have happened through the ignorance of the tranſcribers, miſtaking a mark ſet over ſuch ſyllables by ſome of the antient writers only to ſhew their quantity, for the letter n. I ſhould have thought they might have affected to put this letter in the direct caſe of ſuch words, becauſe they found it in the oblique caſes, had not ſuch words as formonſus and thenſaurus checkt that opinion. In the notes of the antients, N. is read Nec, nepos, non, num, Nonius, noſter, nomiſma, niſi, nummorum, numerator; NAV. Naves, navibus, navicula; NC. Nunc; N.C. O.

O, o, immediately from the original Greek of the ſame form, wherein alſo it continues in moſt of the languages of Europe, indeed all which confeſs a Greek or Latin deſcent, the fourth vowel, and fourteenth letter in the Latin and Engliſh alphabets, had a double ſound, both ſhort and long, as, if we were not told ſo by Quint. Inſt. I, 13, is evident in it ſelf. For it could not be otherwiſe before the invention of ω, ſeveral ages after the days of Cadmus; which indeed is not a different letter from ο, but the ſame, with the connotation of a different quantity, or double time, and that alſo often not obſerved by the Greek poets; or perhaps ο doubled, as its ſmall figure ω ſeems to evince; and its ſound, which differs very little from that of ου, which moſt antiently was ſometimes expreſſed by a ſimple ο, as Fabius tells us, and we are further aſſured from the Βȣϛροφηδὸν and Delian inſcriptions: in the former whereof we meet ΦΑΝΟΔΙΚΟ ΕΙΜΙ ΤΟ ΗΕΡΜΟΚΡΑΤΟΣ, &c. for Φανοδίκου εἰμὶ τοῦ Ἑρμοκράτους, and in the latter, ΤΟ ΑΥΤΟ ΛΙΘΟ ΑΝΔΡΙΑΣ, for Τȣ̃ ἀυτȣ̃ λίθου. And the name of ο it ſelf was originally ου, as Quintilian intimates. What I have ſaid of this fourth vowel, may be alike affirmed of the ſecond ε, which had alſo two ſounds before the invention of η; at which time, as ο had both the ſound and name of ου, ε ſeems to have had the ſound, and ſometimes name of εἶ, for antiently they writ and read ΤΕΙ ΑΓΑΘΕΙ ΤΥΧΕΙ for τῇ ἀγαθῇ τυχῇ, as the more modern Greeks writ: wherein, and in the like words, they however ſubſcribed the exterminated ι. Indeed this increaſe of the number of vowels ſeems rather introduced from an affectation of novelty, than any real neceſſity; ſeeing the Latins, who took a great part of their language from them, never imitated, and indeed never found any occaſion for ſuch an innovation. But the Greeks reſted not here, for they invented alſo ſix ſupernumerary conſonants ζ, ξ, ψ, and φ, χ, θ, all which are rather nexus literarum than real letters; the three former being only a connecting of the three orders of the mutes and the letter σ; the three latter a connecting the ſame orders and the letter Η. Thus ζ connects the third order with σ, ξ the ſecond order; and ψ the firſt. In like manner, θ includes Η in the ſiſter mutes of the third order; χ includes the ſame in the mutes of the ſecond; and φ doth the ſame in the firſt order: and all theſe were writ in the firſt Greek alphabet with two diſtinct letters. For the letter h held the ſame place in the Greek alphabet as it doth now in the Latin and ours, at the time when theſe letters, or, more properly, compendious ways of writing, were invented. And here we may obſerve, that of all theſe eight new letters, as the Greeks pleaſed to call them, the Latins only eſpouſed two κ and χ, the former whereof they ſeldom uſed, as indeed having no occaſion for it, the latter chiefly in Greek words, and ſervile uſes; ſo unneceſſary they accounted theſe innovations. This I judged proper in this place to obſerve once for all, to ſhew the perfection of the Cadmean alphabet; and now proceed to a farther diſſertation on the letter O. The Greeks, as they framed theirs wholly from the Hebrew alphabet, ſo undoubtedly had this letter from the Hebrew ע, to which it anſwers both in the order of the letters and numerals, which in both is ſeventy. How ο by the Greeks came to be adopted for this Hebrew guttural, was ſagaciouſly found out, and judiciouſly accounted for by the learned Dr. Littleton; who obſerves, that the Greeks took their three doubtful vowels α, ι, υ, from the Hebrew ו, י, א to which three conſonants they aſſigned the parts of vowels, by the help whereof they read before the invention of points; for א reading a; for י, e and i; for ו, o and u. Now the Greeks obſerving that the Hebrews had given their firſt guttural א a vocal power, not knowing how better to tranſplant them, gave the ſame power to the three remaining gutturals, making ε from ה he; η from ח hheth, Chald. hetha; and ο from ע, which, as we ſaid above, was firſt ſounded ου, but afterwards, that ο might be upon a level with ε, to which as having a double ſound they had given a double character, to the long ſound of ο they aſſigned likewiſe a double figure Ω, which from its largeneſs in reſpect to the ο they called Ω μέγα, or the great ο, and conſequentially the primitive ο began to be called ο μικρὸν, or the little ο. As to the form of ο, this account may be given: Its mother ע ſignifies either an eye or a fountain, which this figure in ſome ſort repreſents; the former with its corner, the latter with its ſtream. The Greeks neglecting the adjuncts, drew the eye or fountain orbicular, to expreſs the round form of the mouth in making the ſound. This vowel is changed into every other vowel, as every other vowel into it; as from ἄροτρον aratrum, ſo from ſpartum ſporta: as from γόνυ genu, ſo from pendo pondus; as from κόνις cinis, ſo from ὄπισθε poſt; as from alo alumnus, ſo from νὺξ nox, This vowel was not in uſe among ſome nations of Italy, as Pliny informs us, the Tuſcans, and more antient Umbrians, and therefore u was ſubſtituted for it. And indeed the antient Roman writers ſometimes do the ſame, as Acherunte, bubus, frundeſcere, &c. Lucr. On the contrary, others uſed o more frequently for u, writing advorſus, quom, ſervom, voltis, volnus, &c. for adverſus, quum, &c. O is alſo uſed by the antients for au, as codex, colis, plodo, ploſtrum, for caudex, caulis, &c. In the notes of the antients, O. CON. is read Opus conductum; O. C. Q. Opera, conſilioque; O. D. M. Operæ donum, munus; O. LO. Opus locatum.

P, p, Roman, P, p, Italic, 𝔓, 𝔭, Engliſh black letter, but of no great antiquity, nor indeed uſe, the Roman and Italic character having prevailed not only with us, but generally through Europe. The figure of this, as indeed of all the Roman letters, was antiently the ſame with the Grecian, as Pliny informs us, and is confirmed by antient monuments. And indeed it is ſtill but very little different, which may be ſeen, as in the reſt, ſo particularly in this letter, P being only Γ with the tranſverſe and depending line drawn ſemicircular. And indeed the Greek Π itſelf differs no more, ſcarcely ſo much, from its original the Hebrew final ף when turned towards the right. The name of this letter is the ſame in Engliſh, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, פה pe, ſignifying in that tongue a mouth, which the figure ſomewhat repreſents. Its place is the fifteenth letter in the Engliſh and Roman alphabets, and the firſt in the firſt order of the mutes, wherein is a frequent permutation becauſe of their nearneſs in ſound and uſe; for p is only a ſofter b, as b an harder p. The antient Latins writ Burrhus for the Greek Πυῤῥὸς, and in their own language ſometimes were at a ſtand whether to write b or p; as in the inſtance of Fabius, whether obtineo, or optineo, ſince more of this than that was heard in pronunciation. This is alſo proportionably demonſtrated in their very figure, P being half of B. Yea that they have actually changed b into p in many words for this reaſon only, will be evident in declining verbs ending in bo, and bor of the third conjugation, as in nubo, ſcribo, labor, wherein the harder ſound b, when a conſonant is to follow, is changed into the ſofter, p; and this not only in declining ſuch words, but this p from b remains alſo in their participles, verbal nouns, and derivatives; as from ſcribo, ſcriptus, ſcriptura, ſcriptio, ſcriptito, &c. Their near affinity, in the learned languages eſpecially, leads us into the derivation of words wherein they are found. Thus we deduce the etymology of pario, and precor, from the Hebrew ברא and ברך; thus the Latin palpebra and pubes, from the Greek βλέφαρον and βυβὼν, and vice verſâ; ab and ſub from ἀπὸ and ὑπὸ. This their proximity in nature, ſound, and uſe, is excellently denoted in their Greek and Latin figures, Π and P, repreſenting one half of B. Nor is p changed only into b its middle ſound, but alſo into its aſpirate φ, eſpecially in declining verbs and nouns, as is plain in λείβω, λείπσω, λέλειφα, where we find β before a vowel changed into π before a conſonant (as was before noted in Latin verbs of the ſame termination) and π again changed into φ. So in κατήλιπς, ιφος, ιφι, &c. gryps, grgphis, i, &c. and on the contrary φ in etymologies is changed into p, as Περσεφόνη, Proſerpina. To this firſt order of the mutes belong f and v, into which p is alſo changed, as πήγω, figo; πείθω, fido; pilus, filum; and as from λεπὶς, levis, ſo on the contrary from ovis, opilio. Nor doth p refuſe the intercourſe of her ſiſters of the ſecond order. Hence is lepus from λαγὼς, lupus from λύκος; nor of q which belongs to this order: For from ἵππος, Æol. ἴκκος, comes equus: πότε, Ion. κότε, quoties; πῆ, Ion. κῆ, quá. The correſpondence of this mute with the ſiſterhood of the third rank is viſible in σπουδὴ, ſtudium; πέραν, trans; as on the contrary in appeto, applico, &c. for adpeto, adplico. Some kindred between p and the liquids is alſo averred by etymologiſts, but which is, in my opinion, precarious, as too far removed to be depended upon. In pure Latin words this mute only precedes l and r, as plaga, promo: but in Greek words, or of Greek extraction, h, n, ſ, t, as phaſma, philus, phanaticus; dyſpnœa; pſephiſma, pſilæ; Ptolemæus, diptoton. Here it may be proper to note, that when the Latins enfranchiſe a Greek word in which pt begins a ſyllable, they leave out either the former or latter, writing cubo, perna, tuſſis, for κύπτω, πτέρνα, πτύσις. In the middle of words, p admits before it three of the liquids, l, m, r; as culpa, campus, carpo; n alſo, but always by her proxy m, as compleo, compono, for conpleo, conpono. In derivatives from Greek the initial p is ſometimes omitted, as in latus from πλατὺς, uro, from πυρῶ; which however ſeems to appear in comburo for compuro. This letter ſeems alſo ſometimes to be inſerted in ſome Latin words derived from Greek, to hinder the colliſion of two vowels, as in lapis from λαὰς, dapes from δαὶς. P. in the notes of the antients, is read Publius, pondo; PA. DIG. Patricia dignitas; P. C. Patres conſcripti; P. F. Publii filius; P. P. Propoſitum, Propoſitum publicè; P. P. P. P. E. S. S. S. E.
